MONDAY EVENING, AUGUST 26, 1878.

COURTSHIP IN TURKEY .- A lady gives the public a curious and interesting volume on Turkey. It seems that in some parts of the Moslem's domain a lady is wooed with a big stick, and, after the ceremony of marriage, her fair head is knocked against the wall by the tender bridegroom, in the presence of the relatives, just to show her what she may expect habitually. The most stylish and swell way of courting is to catch your girl and lead her home by a safe halter around her neck—a ceremony as necessary as the marrying—for it is typical of the husband's authority and his determination to use it. The kiss and the rope are, therefore, regarded as equally and corjointly indicative of business and declaratory of intentions. A mother might mistrust the kiss, but when she sees the rope around her darling's little neck she gets perfectly composed, knowing that the lover's intentions are honorable, and that she is about to become a motherin-law.

If custom, however, is tyrannical in the ceremonies it prescribes for the masses of the people, it is correspondingly lenient to kings, for the Sultan may marry without rope or kiss; in fact, he may get a wife as he would a horse, and so many that he does not know their names or faces.

In the Scraglio, which is the scene of Don Juan's adventures, the walls are elaborately decorated with the French illustrations of Byron; for some poetic Sultan felt that the Northera bard's verse would preserve his gorgeous pleasure house ages after its crumbling walls had lost the memory of the lazy monarch and his loves.

Begler Bey, one of the three magnificent Seraglios, is like a dream of the Arabian Nights, for it is as beautiful in architecture without as it is gorgeous in the interior furniture and decorations.

Of course, I could "grade my cream by the price," but my cream would lose the good name that years of fair dealing have won for it. I sak that persons abroad ordering "Brengle's Cream" from third parties will assure themselves that the cream sent is certainly from my establishment.
